Carmignac Patrimoine A EUR share class posted +4.8% vs +0.9% for the reference indicator¹ and -2.9% for its Morningstar category².

The handling of the Covid-19 pandemic triggered a substantial shock to growth. After contracting in the second quarter, the global economy recovered in the third – thanks to life support for consumer spending.

Indeed, the speed, scope and form of the authorities' response to the emergency were truly unprecedented. Central banks and governments took concerted action to ensure that enough money would continue to flow to economic agents – businesses and households – to keep them going and to regulate the debt financing of economic activity via the financial markets and banking system. However, the rally in financial assets currently under way is highly dependent on monetary and fiscal support flies in the face of what are still patchy economic fundamentals and a most uncertain outlook.

Our experience in managing previous market crises was useful. This time again, like in 2000, in 2008 and 2011, the first imperative was to rapidly take the full measure of the risk, and act on it. The globalization of the epidemic was a clear possibility in our mind. However, our judgement was that, whereas healthcare systems in Europe and the US were certainly not prepared for the pandemic, policy makers were prepared to deal with a market crisis.

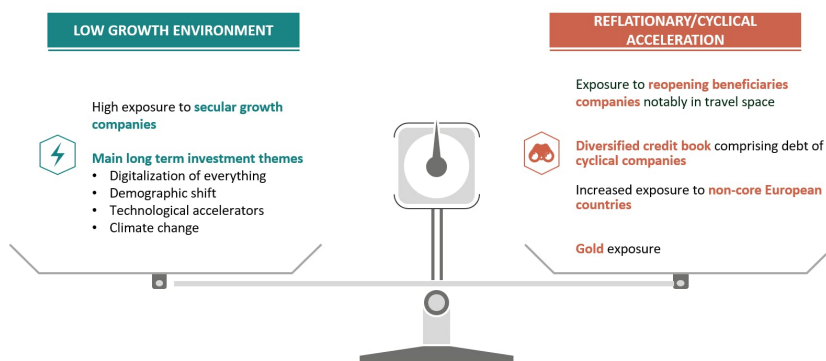

Our highly flexible asset allocation gave us the agility we needed to get through the period.

Indeed, a solid portfolio construction and good risk management during the crisis allowed us to re-expose the Fund to take advantage of market dislocation and profit from the rebound that followed.

On the equity front, our allocation bias for secular growth stocks were the largest contributors to performance, thanks to both their resilience in down markets and sharp rebound in the aftermath. The former can be attributed to their low correlation to economic activity while the latter notably stems for the flight to growth that took place. Indeed, the crisis we are experiencing has accelerated several major underlying trends including digitization and ecommerce. Finally, the combination of loose monetary and fiscal policies led us to build up a position in goldmines to hedge against a risk of higher inflation expectations, that turned out to be very profitable.

On the fixed income front, we limited losses in the drawdown by quickly cutting our exposure to peripheral bonds and Emerging market debt while increasing our cash holdings. Furthermore, the third quarter brought back happy days to corporate credit in the form of rising yields and capital gains made possible by narrowing interest-rate differentials. We believe this segment still offers a great deal of value.

Two scenarios are basically shaping up. On one hand, the shutdown of activities and slow reopening has made the economy more sluggish than ever; on the other, both Central banks and governments are providing an unprecedented support, while a vaccine could be found in the coming months, opening the door for higher inflation expectations and positive economic surprises.

We are therefore keeping on one side our focus on secular growth companies albeit we've taken profit on some of our biggest contributors. Slow growth means it is becoming increasingly hard for companies to become or stay profitable, not to mention the shock many of them have suffered from with the economic pause. Conversely, secular growers -companies that perform regardless of the overall health of the economy- are seeing increased interest from investors. Also, Central banks' loose policies are intended to keep rates low for longer, which could sustain current valuation. A lot of them can be found in the technology sector or in healthcare, an ever-evolving industry. Finally, we have selectively signed up to some IPOs, which had the busiest quarter since 2000 in volume terms.

On the other side, we have adjusted the portfolio to take into account this liquidity-driven environment and positive news flow that could benefit cyclical assets. We are notably playing this thematic via the travel industry, that has suffered a lot from the crisis but benefit from reopening economies. We nevertheless optimize such exposure across the capital structure as such companies are not necessarily attractive in terms of both equity and debt. For example, Airline companies are asset heavy and leveraged, denting on their current and future profitability, and making them unattractive for equity investors. However, their high tangible assets (namely planes) act as collaterals for the cash they are raising, making them attractive for creditors.

As a hedge against a rise in inflation expectations, we hold exposure to goldmines. We are also maintaining our exposure to non-core sovereign debt, supported by coordinated action of governments in the region. We have nevertheless taken profit on our Italian debt as regional elections are coming up.
